

- Home
- Arts, Culture & Society
- Causes
- Columns
- Editorials
- Heroism
- Innovation
- Nature
- Success
- More

Vol 7 Issue 17, Apr 22 - 28, 2016

Citizen Reporters ▶ Sign In | Sign Up | Submit Story Search...

Home ▶ Nature ▶ A flutter of idea

testpage

Feel the pulse of the ecosystem from the flutter of butterflies

By Lesley D Biswas
Kolkata

26 Apr 2016

Posted 04-Nov-2010
Vol 1 Issue 10

The presence of butterflies indicates a healthy ecosystem and to ensure that his City of Joy bathes in a rainbow of flutter, Arjan Basu Roy, the secretary of Nature Mates, a Kolkata based organization working to sensitize people about nature, and the West Bengal Forest Department (WBFD) have developed Banabitan Butterfly Garden in Salt Lake.

Roy has also been associated with other butterfly garden projects to conserve butterflies in eastern India at Suntalekhola, Chilapata Eco-tourism zone and Tiya Bon, all initiatives by the Directorate of Forest, government of West Bengal.

“Butterflies are the most prominent bio-diversity indicators,” points out Roy. “Through them you can understand whether the bio-diversity of a region is secure or not.

Butterflies are not merely beautiful fluttering creatures, but are the most prominent bio-diversity indicators, according to Arjan Basu Roy “Where there are butterflies the ecosystem is secure and human beings who comprise the largest component of the ecosystem are not under threat. If butterflies dwindle, mankind will be the worst hit,” he adds.

Luckily, Kolkata is still a rich haven for butterflies with an impressive 120 to 150 species. As a result of Roy’s passion Banabitan Butterfly Garden in Salt Lake’s central park is a pretty colourful maze of butterflies happily frolicking sweet scented nectar plants like lantana, periwinkle, cosmos and hibiscus.

Butterflies need larval food plants on which they lay their eggs and caterpillars feed and nectar plants for the butterflies to feed. With species like blue tiger, plain barred owl and more common species like plain and glassy tigers, common yellow and common five rings already visiting, providing them a habitat rich in nectar and host plants make it possible for them to multiply.

Roy’s initiative to conserve butterflies is also working as a catalyst to conserve some of the predators like birds and lizards who feed on butterflies. “We have noticed a steady increase in the mynah, jungle babbler and black drongo,” says Roy, who inherited his appreciation for

Enter Your Email ID...

Like 82k Follow Us RSS Feed

Headlines Now naturals For Franchise enquiries +91 78100 00300
India's No.1 hair and beauty salon

A banana a day may keep blindness away

- All 9 Muslims accused in Malegaon blasts case discharged
- JNU rusticates three students, Kanhaiya is fined
- Hold meeting with Ola, Uber over licence: HC
- Over 78 percent turnout in Bengal polls fourth phase
- Case against BJP's Roopa Ganguly for assaulting woman voter
- Panic button must for mobile handsets from next year
- Odd-even hits MPs, rocks parliament

More Headlines

Spotlight

Framed forever

Photographer Media Ramu captures some of the memorable moments from The Weekend Leader – VIT Chennai Person of the Year Award Function held at VIT Chennai. The Award went to Balasaheb Darade wildlife from his father Ajoy Basu Roy.

Read More

To sustain his family Roy was forced to put his passion on hold and start a printing business. A qualified engineer with three diplomas in engineering including one from the renowned Regional Institute of Printing Technology (RIPT), Roy had no idea then that he was destined for greater things.

Interestingly, Roy's induction into conservation came accidentally in 2004 when he took an order to print brochures for the Wbfd. He came into contact with officials in the forest department who shared a thirst for conserving nature and in July 2005 Roy was included in a project by West Bengal Forest Development Corporation Ltd. to develop Gar Panchakot in Purulia as a destination for traditional herbal treatment.

Though he started out as a wildlife photographer Roy found himself restrained as he could not afford a big lenses camera, imperative for wildlife photography. But, on first May 2005 Roy got an idea.

"I was standing in Garpanchkot in Purulia when a beautiful butterfly of the Diana species caught my fancy. The micro-lenses required to photograph butterflies was within my capacity." And then, as he puts it, "I decided to photograph butterflies and ultimately began conserving them."

Like Be the first of your friends to like this.

Print | Email | Share

Comments Community

Login

Recommend Share

Sort by Newest

Start the discussion...

Be the first to comment.

You might also like:

Recharge booster

A lone man's vision and determination brought nature's bounty to Latoria, which was once an arid village, in Rajasthan. Anita Pratap talks to Laxman Singh while Mahesh Bhat takes his pictures

Read More

End of pulp

Booksellers, writers and publishers are worried that Hindi pulp fiction is losing its old popularity. Shilpa Raina and Shweta Sharma find out that the blame is on modern digital technology

Read More

Top Stories

This Week Recent All Time

- Fruity growth
- Maternal mission
- Beri ambitious
- Well, it's Ayurveda
- Feathers & fears

TWL's Citizen Reporters

- The inspiring Ayya ... siddhu
- Uncle Sam's rice to s ... arushidutt
- Survey bares toilets ... mlravichandran
- A man, a dream, a lake ... siddhu
- Water god of Thiruvapur ... siddhu
- Musical evening for a c ... naikshruti

More Stories

BECOME A CITIZEN REPORTER REGISTER NOW

Popular Stories

Quality of success

Aasife Biriyani, popular among Chennai's foodies and sold through nine outlets, was dispensed from a pushcart 18 years ago. Founder Aasife Ahmed made it a Rs 70 crore turnover chain by just not compromising on quality, says P C Vinoj Kumar

Read More

Columns

The Weekend Leader Person of the Year 2011 V Venkatraman

Kudos to Positive Journalism

"The Weekend Leader not only gives a glimpse of the better things happening around us but also tells stories of people who made it possible."

Ajay Chaturvedi, Entrepreneur

More Kudos

Write To Us

TWL TV YouTube

